Paul's place was but a dark shadow in the moonlight as two figures glided out of the trees lining the shore of the Buffalo. They crossed the road and went up the drive to the door where one of them squeezed through the key-hole and the other went under the door. The luminescence of their forms dimly illuminated the dark interior of the barroom.

"I still think we ought'a gone to Emily's", said one, sinking tiredly into a chair. "It's just a breeze to Emily's from the cemetery."

"Stop fussing. You were the one who wanted a beer tonight, not me, so drink up and shut-up."

They sat silently for a while, then the first spirit sighed, "Maybe if we'd started earlier like I wanted to . . ."

"You know we couldn't, Silas. I didn't want to scare those two kids who were making themselves so nice and cozy on my tombstone."

"Would'a served 'em right, Jethro," Silas muttered. "A tombstone ain't no place for what they was doin'."

"Don't be that way, Silas," Jethro grinned. "You were alive and a youngster once yourself a hundred years ago."

"But I never used a cemetery. Can't beat a hay-mow as far as I'm concerned."

"Aw, you're just mad 'cause you ain't alive to go messin' around with cute little gals like she was."

"Hell!" Silas snorted, "You should'a seen the little witch I was out with t'other night. I just think a cemetery ain't no place for that stuff when you're livin'. 'Taint as if they ain't got no time to do things up right-like."

"That's just it, Silas. That young feller is one of them there graduates of the class of 1950, and tomorrow is graduation day. I heard him say so, and he won't have no chance to see his girl for a while."

"That so? Well, I reckon there's other things 'sides seein' her that he won't be doin' for a while," Silas chuckled. "I guess you're right about not scarin' 'em."

"Yeah, would'a been a dirty shame," Jethro nodded. "Nice pair of kids. Really took their loving seriously."

"How seriously?"

"Now was I ever the kind to tell tales out of school, Silas?"

"I always tell you about doings on my headstone," Silas pouted.

"Sure, 'cause you have such a danged uncomfortable one that nobody uses it 'cept about once every ten years," Jethro chuckled. "Mine's so choice, now, that even old Alexander is jealous of it."

"Always bragging, that's you," Silas snorted as he opened up another brace of bottles.

Jethro turned nostalgic as he buried his wispy nose in the foamy topped glass.

"You know, Silas," he said, "I'll be more than a mite sorry to have those kids graduate tomorrow."

"You mean them two who was a 'cavortin' on your tombstone?"

"Naw, not just them, Silas. All of 'em. I guess I've gotten to know most of 'em during the last four years. They all end up on my tombstone, sooner or later."

"Braggin' again?" Silas sneered.

"Nope, not a bit," Jethro shook his head sadly, not permitting himself to be jarred out of his mood of melancholia. "Just statin' a fact. I've come to know 'em all like real good friends. They just mosey around my tombstone, a 'sittin' and a 'talkin' . . . and a 'lovin' in between. I just lay there in my coffin, takin' it all in."

"Don't you feel ashamed of yourself sometimes?"

"Naw, Silas," Jethro shook his head, "They don't know I'm round-about, so what's the difference anyhow? Besides, I wouldn't tell a soul."

"Damn it!" Silas thought.

"I'm goin' to hate to see them kids leavin', Silas."

"If you-all feel so bad about them goin', why don't you drift over to Commencement Hall tomorrow and see 'em graduate?"

"Might just mosey over there and do that, Silas," Jethro nodded thoughtfully. "It's been nigh on to twenty years since I've materialized at a graduation. Hid in a fold of the curtain that time. Might do it again."

"Go ahead, Jethro."

"Say, did I ever tell you about that last time?"

"What about it, Jethro?"

"Well, Silas, I went over there the night before to find a hidin's place, and what do you think I found?"

"I dunno. What?"

"A feller and his gal there in Commencement Hall."

"Yeah? How come at that time of night?"

"What you think, ghost? They was a'lovin', there in the dark an' quiet, takin' one last bit before they graduated the next day."

"What's so unusual about that? Those kids that was on your tombstone tonight was a 'doin' the same thing."

"I wonder if that feller tonight will follow in the footsteps of 'tother?"

"How's that?"

"Becomin' a dean around here."

"You don't mean . . ."

"I shore do!"

"Well, well!"

"People's funny, aint they?"

"Funnier'n ghosts, Jethro."

"Guess I'll go over to Commencement Hall tonight and see who's round-about. Yeah, and then stick around and see 'em graduate. Grand bunch of kids. Got to see 'em off," Jethro murmured, bending over his beer.

"Now let's not go bein' sentimental, Jethro," Silas frowned. "Always when you have a couple of stouts you're in a weepy mood. I guess we should'a stayed in our coffins tonight."

"No, Silas. I'm just thinkin' about them kids. After tomorrow they'll never be back around our cemetery, and we won't know nothing about what they're doin'. Things won't be the same more than ever with this class leaving. Remember when they came? Was close to four-hundred of them then. Biggest class that ever came to ol' Bethany, with about three fellers to every gal. Only half that number now, Silas, what with a lot of them dropping out to go to work and such things. But they were a different sort than the rest of the classes we've watched pass through here. Most of the fellers just out of the service, and the whole danged class older, sort of. Not the same bunch of frivolous kids that the classes were years ago. Guess the war had something to do with that. I heard 'em tell a lot of stories about it. Some funny, some real pathetic."

"Aw, we heard the same thing after the Civil War," Silas shrugged.

"Sure we did, Silas, but this one was different. And now they're all wondering, deep down inside, whether they'll have to fight another one just about when they're gettin' started with life. I'd hate to see it, Silas, now or ever. People ain't made for that kind of stuff."

"Yeah, I reckon you're right, Jethro," Silas admitted, catching a little of Jethro's seriousness. "One night a couple of the kids were there on my headstone, just talkin'. I guess the fella liked the girl a lot, but she was a bit young and he had a hard time understandin' her way of thinking. He was real upset by it. He figured he wasn't much good for her kind of gal any more after some of the things he'd seen and done."

"How'd it all come out?"

"Oh, well enough. It was just a matter of him getting used to living an ordinary sort of life without all the sharp edges he'd been dancin' on for so long. A couple of years here straightened him out."

"I've noticed that Bethany is like that, Silas. It's so small and quiet like that wars and things don't hardly seem true. A lot of fellows got toned down around here after growin' up unnatcher'ly fast."

"And I've seen a bigger parcel of 'em turn from bein' kids into grown folks just about the same way. By and large, I guess Bethany was good for 'em. Course, you ought'a heard some of 'em gripe about the place."

"People are like ghosts, Silas. They'll gripe no matter where they are. How many times have I heard you cussing out that gravestone of yours for being so danged uncomfortable that nobody'll have a thing to do with it?"

"I suppose you're right, Jethro. But no matter, those kids'll soon be going home and in a few years all they'll remember of Bethany is a lot of happyish things."

"I wonder if they'll remember our graveyard, Silas?"

"Sure they will. It's one of the things that make Bethany what it is . . . a nice place for people to get the knack of living."

"'Taint so bad for ghosts either, when you come right down to it. And actually, it's really us, the ghosts of the past, that make Bethany everything that it is. Now everyone of these younguns who're leaving tomorrow will be one of us too . . . parts of Bethany's past . . . for without them, or us, Bethany just wouldn't be. Those kids have done a lot around here. No use mentioning names and things, 'cause they'll be remembered for what they've done. But one thing's for sure: It'll be a long time before Bethany sees another class like 'em; both for what they were, and for what they did in making Bethany College a better place for both themselves and those comin' along behind them."

DON'T YOU AGREE?

It has been said that somewhere along the way today's college graduates have missed some basic truths. Their concept of thrift has been displaced by reliance on Government provided Security.

We believe such a philosophy and attitude are faulty.

Opportunity, not Security is what our college graduates really should want. For by working hard and preparing oneself, one makes his own opportunity and thus creates his own Security.
